AVOIDING THE HEADACHE

Industry faces many problems in these complicated times, problems that multiply daily as business enterprises and labor are bombarded by theorists, opportunists, politicians and the swift and changing current of events.

Among all the problems, the two outstanding ones, in the opinion of Eugene Grace, president of the Bethlehem Steel Company, are the avoidance of a boom condition to prevent economic readjustments, and the supplying of materials for national defense as well as normal needs. Mr. Grace says:

"There are certain mistakes of the past which need not be repeated. The avoidance of such mistakes will tend to keep production on an even basis, prevent runaway markets, assure steadier employment at good wages, and eliminate the readjustments which follow a disruption in our economic system."

The nation hopes that this business leader knows whereof he speaks when he says that industry today is more farsighted than ever before, that there is no expectation of a period of unusual profits, no unreasonable kiting of prices, particularly with respect to defense materials. As has been said countless times in the recent crises, history has a way of repeating itself, but maybe this time Mr. Grace is the oracle predicting a break in the line of unlearned lessons and sorry repetitions of sour experiences and sad mistakes. The fulfillment of so rosy a hope for the future can be accomplished only by a wise and full cooperation between capital and labor—and the government.

The cure for the headache of the gray dawn of the morning after is painful and slow; the better way is prevention, abstention, avoidance of the wild carouse of the night before.

RIGHT-ABOUT-FACE

Indications increase that the government of France is in earnest in its intention to do the right-about-face, partly to please the German overlord now in charge and partly out of malice. A reversal of republican traditions will gratify Hitler, no doubt, and at the same time it will be a species of revenge on those radicals who were trying to convert France to Communism.

The new order, however inspired, is cropping up in unusual quarters. For example, the French government is reported to be considering barring women from office and industrial employment and insisting that they stick by their purely domestic duties. This will be done on the pretext that the jobs women now fill thus can be made available to men out of work.

The government is also "encouraging" a reduction of the number of foreigners in France. Its refugee population is very large and the new French government is planning to put these homeless people out of France on the theory that some of them now hold jobs which Frenchmen can use.

The Petain government's newest decree which confiscates the property of French citizens who fled the country when it surrendered to the Nazis "unless they can give some good reason," leaves room for guessing. Would reluctance to become a slave and a hunkering to stay in one piece be regarded as a good reason?

been done along that line but no thought has been given to doing anything. The nation's credit is about to be strained as it has not been strained before. It is true that the purpose for which the strain is being imposed is endorsed by practically everybody in the country. But that makes it all the more necessary to protect the people. That would seem to impose a bigger obligation not to take advantage of their confidence. But, apparently, the only plan the Government has is to continue its practice of selling its bonds to the banks, already choked with Government securities. All competent authorities agree that indefinite continuation of this practice is a menace to national credit and bank solvency which easily can lead to depreciation of the currency by the issuance of fiat money with which to redeem the Government securities—in brief, to the cruder form of inflation.

BEYOND doubt the new tax bill will increase revenues to some extent, but it is conceded to be a half-baked and wholly inadequate measure. More and heavier taxes will have to be imposed next year, regardless of who is elected President, and the people generally are reconciled to the inevitability of these. In fact, there has been evinced a rather extraordinary public willingness to make the necessary sacrifices—a willingness which should have shamed the politicians who refrained from suggesting any new taxes before the election for fear of the political effect.

YET it is quite obvious that the task of preserving the national credit under the strain of an additional eleven billions of debt cannot be accomplished through taxes alone. All the financial experts insist that to meet fifty per cent. of the defense expenses by tax revenue would be the extreme possible limit. To go beyond that limit means empty houses and bankruptcies which would destroy the source of income. Already esti-

SYNOPSIS

Rue Hatterick married the noted surgeon, Brule Hatterick, ten months after the death of his first wife, Crystal. Rue had nursed Crystal in her fatal illness. The marriage is platonic, Brule having told Rue frankly that the reason he wanted her for his wife was because of his 15-year-old daughter, Madge. The latter resents Rue, but Rue has a staunch ally in Steven Hendrie, Crystal's step-brother and well known composer. The night of her social debut Rue is disappointed when Brule sends his assistant and protege, Dr. Andrew Crittenden, to escort her to the opera in his place. Andy seems surprised to see Alicia Pelham, Steven's fiancée and Crystal's best friend, at the opera. He stuns Rue with the announcement: "They believe Crystal was murdered!" Someone had written the police, suggesting that they investigate her death. Rue is suspected, of course. Andy says poison was the only explanation of her death. He takes Rue to a nearby drugstore for a sedative. As they emerge, they see Alicia entering Brule's coupe at the theatre entrance, but Rue believes they must be mistaken. Andy professes his love for Rue and begs her to go away with him. Rue repulses him, saying she did not commit murder and will not leave Brule. Arriving home, Rue finds Detective Miller and Funk waiting to question her. It was when she was asked if she had given Crystal any drugs that Rue remembered a significant incident which she does not disclose to the police. She had given Crystal the medicine which Juliet Garder, the day nurse, had prepared and left on the table. When she took it, Crystal noted its bitterness, saying "Andy must have changed my medicine today." After the detectives go, Andy takes his leave, warning Rue to say nothing. Brule arrives home at 1:30, tired and wan. He tells Rue he consented to the exhumation of Crystal's body and they will soon look the truth.

CHAPTER NINE

Rue said: "Is it true? Was she murdered?"

Brule could be either brutally direct or neatly, coolly evasive; she had seen him in both moods. He looked at her, now, speculatively.

"What did Andy tell you?"

"Andy didn't find you, then? When he left here he said he was going to see you."

Brule looked at the glass he held, tipped it a little and said: "I haven't seen Andy since about six. I take it he told you the main points."

"He told me about the letters, about the police coming to your office. They were here tonight."

"Tonight!" It startled him; she could see that by the way his eyes narrowed and lighted and the way his mouth straightened itself under his mustache. He added after a moment: "What did they want? Did they question you? What did they ask you?"

She told him swiftly, word for word as near as she could remember them. When she came to her memory of the medicine she faltered. But Brule extracted it quickly.

"Did you tell them you had given her the last dose of medicine?"

"No—that is, Andy said that naturally I had given it to her and that he had prescribed it."

"And did you give it to her?"

"Yes. Yes, I do."

"Why?"

"Because—because she said it was bitter. And then she drank it." She had meant to question him. She still meant to. But he was questioning her.

"Did you tell the police that?"

"No. No, I didn't."

"Why?" he asked again, watching her.

"Because I—Brule, you must tell me, was she murdered?"

For a moment she thought he intended to evade again, but he didn't. Instead he put the small glass deliberately down on the mantel and turned slowly back to her again.

"You want the truth, don't you, Rue? Well then—I don't know."

"But—but what do you think? What are we going to do? What—"

"Nothing. There's nothing we can do now."

"Do you mean—"

"I mean only that. There's nothing we can do. Those things take time; perhaps they'll never discover anything—that lends credence to their notion. Any kind of chemical analysis after so long a time has—"

"Believe me, my dear, there's nothing. Did Andy take you to the opera?"

"I—couldn't stay. He told me after we arrived. We went away. Alicia was there. She left just before we got in the car. We went into a drugstore, and when we came out we saw her leaving."

"Did you? Well, Rue—I'm off to bed."

"But . . ." His assurance baffled her; yet he was right, too. What could she do that night?

"Andy said you were trying to pull wires."

"Oh, I'll do what I can. Guy's—"

"You'll have weathered many things by the time you reach my age," said Brule looking into Rue's eyes.

passed in. Unless, of course, they know what to look for; but you can't just fumble in the dark; different poisons show their presence by different and varying tests. Unless the police doctors know what to look for, and I take it so far they do not know, it will be difficult—it may even prove impossible to find and prove the presence of any particular chemical in a lethal quantity. The thing to do is sit tight. Go on with your usual routine. I won't say forget it—"

"Andy thinks she was murdered."

"Brule's eyes were bright, dark, altogether enigmatic."

"Yes, I know."

"Do you think so?"

"I don't know, Rue. I've told you that. When she died I did think once of suicide. But I saw no reason for publicizing that—speculation. And I had no very good reasons for it. Except—well, you were there when she died. You know how unexpected it was."

"Who could have killed her?"

"Again, I don't know. It doesn't seem very likely that she was murdered. I don't think the police will ever be able to prove anything."

"Who wrote those letters? It must be someone who knows something of her death—and the truth of it."

Brule lifted his eyebrows.

"Or someone who wants to make trouble. I don't know who wrote them. But when the tumult and shooting have died down for lack of evidence, I intend to find out."

When that look was in Brule's face the nurses at the hospital covered. It was only something cold and dark in his eyes and a kind of tight look around the clean line of his jaw. But Rue knew it well. She said: "There must be something we can do—" coming in tomorrow. I'll talk to him just in case. Don't let this worry you too much, Rue. I'll see to it the police don't bother you; Guy will look up some kind of protection for you. After all, they have no proof of anything. And they'll probably never have proof."

"But if she was murdered—"

"Well?"

"Oughtn't we—do something? Tell the police—"

"Why?"

"Why, because it's right. Because—"

"Crystal's dead. Madge is very much alive and young. You are, too, Rue, and you are my wife. Steven is frail and horribly sensitive, and his music is of no small value. I myself have my—small importance in the world. Andy was her attending physician, and he's just entered upon what promises to be a brilliant career. Why ruin five lives? . . . You don't know, Rue, what a murder inquiry is. . . . Now, my child, go to bed."

He went to her and put his hand for a moment under her chin and looked down at her, smiling a little.

"You'll have weathered many things by the time you reach my age. How old are you, Rue? Twenty-five. . . ."

"Twenty-six."

"I'm close to forty. I've worked hard. I've learned, I think, in a hard school to control emotions—"

"You—"

She stopped abruptly, checked by the hard directness of his eyes.

"You were about to say I have no emotions. Wasn't that it? Well, that is as may be. Go to bed. It's cold here. I'll have another drink before I go up."

mated governmental taxes approximate twenty-eight per cent. of our national income. Without killing business, confiscating property and imperiling our whole economic system, taxation cannot be pushed beyond a certain limit. And that limit will not produce the money to pay this bill.

WHAT, then, is the answer? It would seem that everyone would know it to be reduction in governmental costs. That steps in that direction have not been taken and are not planned is hard to understand. Nevertheless, the only proposed step—the one embodied in the Byrd resolution for a ten per cent. cut all down the line—was scuttled by the Administration forces in the Senate six weeks ago. Today retrenchment is not even discussed. A nation which for ten years has been living far beyond its means now proposes to add eleven billions to a debt already higher than seems safe without tightening its belt a notch. And the party in power in the platform upon which it seeks continuation in office ignored the whole subject of Federal finance as though it did not exist.

THAT under existing conditions the Government should not immediately suspend all public work not actually essential to the general welfare, and curtail all governmental activities and expenditures so as to permit the handling of this immense armament program without undermining the national credit, just does not make sense. But no such course is in contemplation. There is no plan to curtail or cut down—not even in the WPA, where the greatest savings could be made and although the defense program is certain greatly to reduce unemployment. The last thing this Administration is cut down—at least before election—is cut down. Rather than do that it seems willing to risk irretrievable economic ruin. This is not a pleasant picture to look at, but the more people can be made to view it now, the less painful it is likely to be in the end.

President Satterthwaite suggested that a substitute be employed until a suitable teacher has been found for the position.

Hollis A. Lachat, head of the Summer school, in his report, said that 135 pupils were enrolled. Of this number, 98 were high school students, four in grade six, 15 in grade seven, and 18 in grade eight.

Exactly 191 subjects were carried. Thirty-two failed in one subject; eight in two subjects and two in three subjects.

The percentage of pupils failing was 31.1. Of the total of 191 subjects carried, 54 subjects were failed, making a percentage of 28.3 subjects failed.

Reporting on the school fund accounts, Mr. Lachat explained the bank balance for July is $4,333.17.

CLARENCE FUHRMAN, leader of the KYW Rhythmaires now playing at Willow Grove Park Dance Casino.

Tomorrow the 6th Battalion, U. S. Marine Reserve Band, will give a free evening concert in the music pavilion at Willow Grove Park.

Clarence Fuhrman and his famous KYW Rhythmaires are now playing nightly, except Sundays and Mondays.

in the park's ultra modern dance casino.

From September 2 to 8, inclusive, Willow Grove Park will stage the Greater Philadelphia Cavalcade of Progress, including a watercade on the park lake, a huge pageant of Americanism, a Miss Liberty Belle contest—entrants will dress in Colonial costume—a Pot of Gold Treasure Hunt and free industrial, agricultural exhibitions, a home equipment show and an auto show. For this occasion the Cetlin & Wilson Shows will move their famous streamlined midway into the park and present such spectacles as the human cannon-ball act and noted aerialists.

Following the completion of his current feature, "Pioneer Days," at the Bristol Theatre, Randall invited his pals, Tex Ritter and Rex Bell, to join him on a wild horse hunt in Montana. The three were gone for about four weeks, roughing it miles back in the Montana hills. They would spend from six to eight hours a day on horseback tracking down and then chasing the wild horses.

The three were gone for about four weeks, roughing it miles back in the Montana hills. They would spend from six to eight hours a day on horseback tracking down and then chasing the wild horses.

On his day-off, Jack Randall, west-end star, resorts to similar relaxation tactics.

Weaving a dramatic romance about a girl from the wrong side of the tracks and her Prince Charming who runs a hamburger stand, "Primrose Path" brings Ginger Rogers and Joel McCrea to local screens shortly in their first co-starring vehicle in six years, and in one that marks a significant milestone in their careers.

Adapted from the sensational Broadway dramatic success, the story deals with the stormy romance of Ellie May Adams and Ed Wallace. Ellie May, desperately ashamed of her dissolute family and determined to keep decent herself, meets Ed while Lovely, dark-eyed Linda Darnell wins new laurels in her spectacular career with "Star Dust," which last night brought to Grand Theatre audiences a story so real and thrilling that it might well have been a chapter out of her own life.

Boasting the most original entertainment idea in years, "Star Dust" depicts the heartaches and happiness of two plucky small-town youngsters, scrapping for their place in the sun and finding out things about love in the great adventure that is Hollywood.
